

A WEEK-END "BACHELOR" WRITES TO MRS. WILSON

His Unique Recipes for Dishes That Tempt the Appetites of Tired, Hungry Men After a Day's Fishing

By MRS. M. A. WILSON

Dear Mrs. Wilson—I see that so many of the ladies are sending in their pet recipes...

Boat House Biscuit

Take as you say, a mixing bowl and I use a milk kettle, for mixing—and place in it...

Beef Stew With Onion Cake

Cut one and a half pounds of stewing beef in pieces and then place in a steaming pot and add...

Baked Fish

We do quite some fishing and our fish, fresh from the water, is sealed at once and then cleaned...

We all like this dessert, and as it is easy to make, we have it every week. I usually prepare the pudding and put it in the oven after supper on Friday night...

This is our method of prepared ham slices for breakfast. Mince a small piece of ham very fine and parboil. We usually use one and one-half cups of minced ham...

Three level tablespoons of sugar

CAPE-COAT DRESS MADE OF BEIGE WOOL

By CORINNE LOVE

Here is a cape-coat dress of beige wool with ribbed surface, the leading feature of which is a deep cape lined with brown satin...

Ruby. "I haven't got a thing to do—keeping in the room for 2 o'clock, every thing's neat as wax, I'll have to knit again—I believe I'll crochet some lace for your wife, Mr. Busby; she was admiring the butterfly pattern—"

"Ding it all, Ruby, don't put any more lace-diddles into my house," objected Mr. Busby forcibly.

"Everything has lace dangling from it—I ketch my fingers in the edges of the pillow slips at night and pull lamps off the table mats and dishes off the table—make her something to wear, Ruby, that's a good girl," he counseled.

Ruby jumped up to give a letter to Deacon Smart and to poke a weekly paper through the grating at old Mrs. Fowler, leaving a blast of cold air in the tiny office which was perched on the very edge of the little lake.

"It's growing warmer, Ruby, going to have a thaw, and Mrs. Fowler departed, leaving a blast of cold air in the tiny office which was perched on the very edge of the little lake.

Ruby yawned fretfully. "Nothing ever happens here," she complained.

"Make it happen, then," retorted good-natured Mr. Busby.

"How can I make it happen?" asked the girl.

"There's only one—or two—"

Ruby's voice trailed off into silence.

The remainder of the day was very busy for both of them and there was little talk between the postmaster and his young assistant.

"Some day he would take her home in his sleigh that night after the office closed, as he was going down her way, but he did not tell her that big Cornelius Wayne, his nephew, would be along. Cornelius didn't know it himself until he brought the double cutter around to the postoffice at 8 o'clock. Mr. Busby got into the front seat of the double sleigh, helped Ruby into the back seat, motioned Cornelius to get in there with the gig and drove away.

"All right, Uncle Jim." And it was apparent that Ruby didn't object to being ordered around in the service of a fair lady. Ruby had always held him aloof—perhaps it was because she was afraid she would like him too well.

Cornelius was a nice boy and he was making lots of money with his model chicken farm, but Ruby, in spite of her idle chatter, was afraid of love, and somehow Cornelius recognized that, though she had never recognized that fact. Now the two of them rode silently side by side, with a moon breaking through the clouds to stare at them and the cold wind tingling their cheeks.

Meanwhile Mr. Busby racked his brain to think of some way to make them talk, and while he worried about it the spirited black horse brought about the desired result without being consulted at all. There was a patch of white near the graveyard, a staring white horse and a dark horse, and the moonlight fell upon it.

The horse had seen it before and shied at it every time, and so tonight he shied and the moonlight fell upon it.

Ruby and young Cornelius sat up in the snow and stared at each other. Then they began to laugh at their plight, and the laughter seemed to melt the strangeness of their being together.

Cornelius helped Ruby out of the snow and wiped her face dry with his big white handkerchief. His fingers shook a little as he did so; her cheeks were soft and round like a baby's and her hair was soft and wavy that they could little hands and brushed off the snow from her garments. "You look like an Easter rabbit," he said admiringly.

"I feel more like a snow owl," laughed Ruby. "But that's very, very better look out for yourself. You'll be catching cold!"

"We better walk home the rest of the way," suggested Cornelius. "I can warm up and I don't believe Uncle Jim will miss us till he gets to your house."

So he tucked Ruby's hand under his arm as they started on their way. Finding their tongues loosed, and discovering that they liked the same books and the same dances and the same phonograph records, Ruby related how she had told his uncle that very afternoon that nothing ever happened in Lakeside.

"And just see what has happened tonight," she cried.

"That's right," agreed Cornelius in an odd voice, and added that they were both very quiet, but he held her hand close in his arm all the way.

When they reached Ruby's house Mr. Busby was just driving back after them. After all the excitement and the noise and Mr. Busby had coughed a great deal and patted the black horse very apologetically, he told Cornelius he would take him home if he was ready to go.

"I'm going to stay and have supper with Ruby," said Cornelius boldly.

"She asked me to."

"The next morning Ruby came into the postoffice looking very happy. "Going to be a dull day, Ruby, but today was Mr. Busby. Nothing ever happens in Lakeside. I wish some handsome drummer would come along or—"

"Mr. Busby," interrupted Ruby with a threat in her voice and a laugh in her eyes, "if you say anything more like that—I'll crochet some table napkins for your wife."

"Keep 'em for your hope chest," chuckled the postmaster as he dodged out of the door.

"I wonder," said Ruby, as she opened her racket and gave a package to little Sammy Jones, who stared incredulously. "There's a first time for everything, I s'pose, and she wasn't thinking about Sammy Jones at all."

The best thing about the rugs—even better than the wonderfully low prices—is that they are brand-new, fresh goods, shipped straight from Japan as soon as they were made. The first-quality rice straw is "live" and pliable, not dried out from long storage. The double warps are heavy and strong. Everything about the rugs, from the patterns to the bindings, is desirable.

THE DAILY NOVELETTE

When Love Comes By KATE EDMONDS

"It's a ditch water," declared Ruby Dexter as the postoffice door closed behind a small colored boy. "I've been here two years, Mr. Busby, and almost every day I've thought, 'Something new will happen today'—but it's always the same old treadmill!"

Mr. Busby looked up from the stamp drawer which he was cleaning out and there was a twinkle in his jolly blue eye. "Ain't it a change to have Sammy Jones come in fer his maw's mail?" he chuckled.

Ruby snarled. "Change? Mr. Busby, you know that young one's been in here twice a day regularly for mail, and they never got one single letter yet. It makes me wild to think 'I'll stay here and stay till I'm old and homely'—"

"Maybe I'll see you, Ruby," interrupted Mr. Busby.

"That would be a change," agreed Ruby.
